

Reality check: India arrived in England carrying the confidence of its historic ODI World Cup triumph, but an underwhelming campaign exposed the lack of batting depth and balance still separating it from the best in the T20 format.

Indians at the T20 World Cup, too. They also had huge support in every match, which wasn't surprising, given the large Indian diaspora in the UK.

One would often run into Indian fans at every venue where the team played, many of them having travelled from various parts of Britain.

India's underwhelming performance shouldn't actually be a shock. This team depends too much on too few players, and there isn't enough depth in the batting. You cannot have just one big hitter for the death overs and expect her to click in every game. At the very least, you should give her a decent number of deliveries. Richa Ghosh faced just one ball in that crucial match against Australia.

India has an excellent ODI team, no doubt. But to have a strong, well-rounded T20 team, some rebuilding is required. India also needs a bowler or two who can
