France finished fourth, but Mbappe finished with unmatched output.

Ten goals and four assists in eight appearances earned him the Golden Boot and Bronze Ball, while his brace against England took him to 22 World Cup goals, a new men's record.

He opened with braces against Senegal and Iraq, then struck twice more against Sweden. A penalty against Paraguay and a goal plus an assist against Morocco took France into the semifinals. Spain stopped him in the semifinal, cutting the connection between Mbappe and Michael Olise, but he responded with two goals in the 6-4 third-place defeat to England.

Those strikes made him the first man to reach double figures at one World Cup since Gerd Muller in 1970. They also secured a second successive Golden Boot, making Mbappe the first player to win the award twice.

That paradox defined his campaign. France, possessing the tournament's most prolific scorer, reached the last four but ultimately ended without a medal after losing its final two matches. Mbappe couldn't turn individual supremacy into collective reward, but no player stretched defences more relentlessly or finished chances more clinically across the tournament.
