Rachin Ravindra may not have featured for Kolkata Knight Riders so far in this edition of the Indian Premier League (IPL), but the New Zealand all-rounder insists that patience, perspective and constant evolution remain central to his approach as he navigates selection competition, the demands of three-format cricket, and the rapidly shifting T20 landscape.

On waiting for his chance at KKR

I wouldn't really call it frustrating. First of all, it's great to be part of a new franchise, and it's such a good group to be around. I'm enjoying my time here.

For me, it's about understanding that the team is out there and I'm supporting them in every way I can. Whether that's helping with preparation or doing my bit to contribute to wins, it matters. That could be in the starting XII or on the bench, whatever the role looks like.

As soon as you start feeling frustrated, your mindset can turn negative. For me, it's about staying positive and getting better.

Of course, you always want to play, but I've had a lot of cricket recently. Even when I'm not in the XI, it's about contributing to the team environment. There are plenty of talented players here, and if you're missing out to someone like Finn Allen, Cameron Green or Sunil Narine, you understand they are quality players who shape the team's balance. That doesn't bother me too much.

On back-to-back heartbreak in ICC finals (2025 Champions Trophy and 2026 T20 World Cup) against India

It probably still hurts. I think it's always going to. There are times I think back, and hindsight is a great

I love playing all three formats. You love Test cricket, it's beautiful, but then this [T20] format brings freedom.
