

On adapting to evolving T20 demands

That's going to be the ever-evolving thing about our game. We see how T20 is evolving, and if you're not able to evolve as a player, you're going to be left behind.

There are plenty of guys in that mould who can consistently do it. You only have to look at Virat Kohli, who does something similar. He takes his time but has also transformed his T20 game over the last two or three years.

So the beauty is, if the ability and skill are there, you can transfer them across formats. That, to me, is the challenge. I love playing all three formats. You love Test cricket, it's beautiful, but then this [T20] format brings freedom.

You've almost got to give away the notion of your wicket. In the other formats, your pride lies in spending time at the crease. I'm naturally a stroke-maker, so that helps. But in this format, it's about how you can push the team forward and forget about your wicket.

There are also a few technical changes that allow you to do that.

On managing workload across formats

It's always going to be a challenge.

So, if you look at it this way, me missing out on a couple of games here is actually not the worst thing for my game.

We've got Chris Donaldson, the strength and conditioning coach from New Zealand, here as well. He's an amazing guy. On most days, I'm in the gym and running, even on game days, which helps build things over time and prepares me for what's to come.

Also, the quality of training you can get here in India is outstanding, with Watto (Shane Watson) and Abhishek Nayar around. We've got a great crew, and I'm learning from them as well. It allows you to have those little training blocks when you think you might not.

That's always going to be a challenge in terms of finding rest because, since the ODI World Cup 2023, I really haven't had a break. I've been very grateful for it because I've been able to play all three formats and franchise cricket around the world. But there comes a time when you probably need a mental break and a chance to relax.

I'll get that at the end of The Hundred this year, around mid-to-late August, until India comes to New Zealand. I'll have almost two months to rest, work on a few things,

Learning from the best: Ravindra cherished the support from the world's best at the IPL. EMMANUEL YOGINI and focus on my body.

On learning from multiple coaches and having New Zealand teammates around

It's ultimately up to the player. I think it's awesome having all these coaches, who are very good at what they do. They're able to filter through what they say, and it's not just information after information. Then it's on us, as players, to take what we need and make that our own. You never listen to everything blindly, and you also never ignore everything because these guys are here to help you. They are different people, and earlier in my career, especially in the IPL, the amount of information could feel overwhelming because there's stats, analysis, match-ups and so much data. But with experience, you get better at filtering what works for you.

And it's obviously nice to have the Kiwi guys here. We hang out a lot and when you're in a long tournament away from home, it's nice to have familiar faces around you.