"We compete on the field, but off the field we should be helping each other as well. We all have our own individual targets and metrics for what we want to achieve. I think we have all been consistent in what we want: more cricket on a more regular basis, playing against the top teams. You don't always have to play the Englands and Australias of the world. We want to play a mix of teams because that will help improve our cricket," she said, adding that the ICC should eventually introduce a system in which teams performing consistently well in lower divisions are rewarded with series or matches against the bigger sides.

For now, that appears to be wishful thinking.

One ICC board member conceded that a packed international calendar leaves little room for regular bilateral series with Associate members. "But then we try to play a tri-series or something ahead of those big tours, so that the smaller teams get a chance to watch the players in action," the board member said.

Ground realities

Back in 2022, the Netherlands hogged the limelight after knocking South Africa out of the T20 World Cup. Former Netherlands coach Ryan Campbell hoped that things would improve, both in terms of exposure and funding, for the Men in Orange. Six years on, most Associate nations are still chasing the same elusive goal: proper infrastructure.

Nepal, for instance, plays its home games in Kirtipur, where fans turn up in impressive numbers, but it lacks indoor facilities. The team frequently travels to India to train at the BCCI's Centre of Excellence in Bengaluru or at private residential academies.

Players from the Netherlands have limited experience of night games because there are no such facilities at home, and much of their training is conducted indoors. It is a similar story for Namibia.
