Will Jacks played a key all-round role for England across departments. Batting in the lower middle order, Jacks smashed 226 runs in eight innings at a strike rate of 176.56 and an average of over 56. With the ball, he picked up nine wickets with his off-spin, operating across different phases of play. His best display came in England's narrow four-wicket win over New Zealand. In that match, he first took two wickets for just 23 runs in his full quota before scoring an unbeaten 18-ball 32 to finish the game with three balls to spare.

Operating in the shadow of several high-profile Indian stars, Shivam Dube quietly produced one of the tournament's most influential supporting acts.

The batting all-rounder delivered a series of timely cameos, often arriving in the latter half of the innings and taking on the spinners who dominated the competition. Against Pakistan, he struck a brisk 27 off 17 balls after India had lost back-to-back wickets in the 15th over. Against the Netherlands, he rescued the innings with 66 off 31 after India had slipped to 69 for 3 in nine overs. In the semifinal, he hammered 43 off 25, including 22 off just eight balls from Adil Rashid, who conceded only 19 from his other 16 deliveries. Dube signed off with a barnstorming eight-ball 26 to buttress India's record total in the final.

New Zealand skipper Mitchell Santner played the understated role of tying down one end with his left-arm orthodox spin. Santner finished with an economy rate of 6.60. While he picked up only two wickets, his control created pressure from one end and allowed other bowlers to attack. Santner also contributed with the bat, including a crucial 47 against Sri Lanka that helped New Zealand recover to 168 for seven from 84 for six. He also finished with figures of one for 19 in his four overs as the Kiwis won that game by 61 runs.
