that they lost from a good position and were virtually out of the tournament with that loss.

It's tough to comment from this distance, but the question that most cricket lovers would ask is: did we play all fit players, or were there some who weren't 100%? Playing a player who isn't fully fit is understandable if that player is an impact player capable of delivering, even if not fully fit. Otherwise, it suggests that the reserve players are not good enough to take the injured player's place. Hopefully, I am completely wrong, but to see players playing with bandaged fingers does give the impression that they are carrying an injury, even if it may be a minor one.

The other aspect that was noticeable is that, despite the 50-over win and the other matches where runs against the spinners were regularly taken over extra cover, there was no attempt to cover that gap with a fielder and make the batters attempt lofted shots with an open face of the bat.

Every game has to be a learning experience, and some learning curves are steep and sharp. If our men's and women's teams learn from that, then Indian cricket lovers may not have another Sunday like this for a long, long time.
