

Power vs pressure

More than a decade after their first meeting, Conor McGregor and Max Holloway meet again in a compelling rematch. McGregor seeks a defining comeback, while Holloway aims to show that pressure still beats power.

Nigamanth P

nigamanth.p@thehindu.co.in

More than a decade after their first meeting, Conor McGregor and Max Holloway are set to run it back in one of the UFC's most fascinating rematches. Their first fight in 2013 ended with McGregor winning a unanimous decision after injuring his knee early in the contest. But both men have evolved dramatically since then.

The question is no longer who was better more than a decade ago. It is whether McGregor can still summon the brilliance that made him the sport's biggest star, or whether Holloway's relentless pressure proves too much over five rounds.

The opening minutes will be crucial. McGregor has historically done his best work early, using his wide karate stance, distance management and devastating left hand to catch opponents before they can establish a rhythm.

His ability to intercept opponents as they step into range has long been central to his success. Expect him to attack Holloway's lead leg with calf kicks, fire straight lefts down the middle and punish every defensive mistake with counters.

For Holloway, the key is survival without becoming passive. The Hawaiian has built his career on volume rather than one-shot power. His average fight time is 16:39 minutes, highlighting his tendency to take fights deep.

His jab, bodywork and combinations gradually wear opponents down before they realise the tide has turned. Unlike many of McGregor's previous

Opening chapter: McGregor and Holloway first crossed paths in 2013, when a rising Irishman outclassed the Hawaiian over three rounds. McGregor controlled the contest from start to finish, earning a commanding unanimous decision with scores of 30-27, 30-27 and 30-26. GETTY IMAGES

