Jordan Pickford

Jordan Pickford is not a new name in England's goalkeeping conversation — and that is precisely why he matters for 2026. The Everton goalkeeper is almost certain to head to his third World Cup, having been central to England's last two campaigns. 2018 was his breakthrough: he established himself as Gareth Southgate's No. 1, saving from Carlos Bacca in the shootout win over Colombia and helping England reach its first World Cup semifinal since 1990 before finishing fourth. He then underlined his reliability at Euro 2020, winning the Golden Glove as England reached the final.

In Qatar four years later, Pickford again played every minute as England topped its group, kept three clean sheets, before exiting in the quarterfinal against France. Those campaigns have made him one of England's most tournament-tested players — a goalkeeper accustomed to long spells of little involvement followed by sudden, high-pressure moments.

England qualified for the 2026 World Cup with two games to spare in October 2025, and Pickford's case has only strengthened since. With 82 caps and 42 clean sheets, he set a national men's team record with an eighth successive clean sheet in 90-minute matches last year.

At club level, Pickford remains Everton's anchor. He signed a new four-year contract in last year, and in March 2026 became the first goalkeeper to win four Premier League Save of the Month awards.

He may no longer be a discovery, but England's hopes in 2026 could still rest on his reflexes, organisation and command of the penalty area.
