in T20 cricket? No. (laughs)

All the best to them in one-day cricket, though!

The use of saliva on the ball is allowed in this IPL. As an all-rounder, what's your take?

To be honest, in white-ball cricket, saliva doesn't make much of a difference when shining the ball.

Should it return to international cricket? Personally, yes. We all understand why it was banned, but I think it's fine to bring it back.

Will it help bowlers? I'm not sure it will have much impact in white-ball cricket. But the new rule allowing a ball change in the second innings is a good move — it could balance the contest between batting first and second.

There's been debate about the Impact Player rule making all-rounders redundant. What's your view?

I think they should move on from it — unless it's going to be introduced in international cricket. Otherwise, it doesn't serve much purpose, especially for Indian cricket.

If the goal is to develop all-rounders for the international stage, they need exposure at the highest level, and the IPL is that platform. The rules should align with international cricket.

I think they should move on from the Impact Player rule — unless it's going to be introduced in international cricket. Otherwise, it doesn't serve much purpose, especially for Indian cricket.
