“I won a few titles with Bayern Munich, and I’d like to continue this path at Barcelona,” said German coach Hansi Flick when he took charge of the Catalan side a year ago.

One season on, he has led the Blaugrana to its 28th La Liga title (above) and completed a domestic treble after winning the Spanish Super Cup and Copa del Rey.

With the youngest squad in the league (average age 24.1), it was only fitting that youngsters Lamine Yamal and Fermin Lopez were the ones to find the back of the net in Barcelona’s derby against Espanyol, sealing the trophy with two games to spare.

Having scored the most goals in Europe this season (99) — an average of 2.67 per game — Barca has also been defensively solid, conceding only 39 goals (the fourth-lowest) while allowing the fewest shots faced at just 285.

Moreover, one of the most satisfying aspects of the team’s season will be its unblemished 4-0 record against arch rival Real Madrid — the first time it has won every El Clasico in a season in which the sides have met at least three times.

Down to the wire

While leagues around the world are wrapping up, in Italy, the race for the title is going down to the final matchday.

Defending Serie A champion Inter Milan trails leader Napoli by just one point, with both sides squandering opportunities to gain a significant advantage after drawing against Lazio and Parma respectively in their penultimate matches.

Inter manager Simone Inzaghi is also preparing for a Champions League final against Paris Saint-Germain, keeping his plate full as he tries to win the Scudetto back.

Meanwhile, Napoli’s Antonio
