Conte is aiming to become the first manager to win the Italian league with three different clubs, having previously won it with Juventus and, more recently, Inter.

With Napoli hosting Cagliari and Inter travelling to Como on the final matchday, fine margins could ultimately decide where the trophy ends up. And if both teams finish level on points, a play-off decider adds yet another layer of intrigue.

End of eras

For some clubs, the end of the season is also a time to bid farewell to legends. Some bow out on a high, while others aren't so lucky.

Bayern Munich's Thomas Muller oversaw the club's return to the Bundesliga summit before concluding his 25-year association with the club.

The German departs as Bayern's record appearance-maker (751), with 13 league titles — including an extraordinary run of 11 in a row (2012/13 to 2022/23).

Meanwhile, in the Premier League, despite Leicester City's relegation, Jamie Vardy (right) signed off with his 200th goal for the Foxes in his 500th and final appearance, against Ipswich Town.

Vardy scored 145 of those goals in the Premier League, including 24 in the unforgettable 2015–16 season when Leicester defied 5000–1 odds to lift its first and only league title.

In Manchester, the blue side will part ways with one of its linchpins: Kevin De Bruyne. However, the Belgian — the last remaining member of the pre-Pep Guardiola era — did not get his perfect curtain call, as City fell to Crystal Palace in the FA Cup final, its last shot at silverware this season.

Nonetheless, De Bruyne leaves Manchester City as one of the finest midfielders of the modern era, with 14 major trophies to his name.
