such batters, you'll naturally do well in international cricket too. These experiences and exposures have played a key role in my development.

Are you a believer in planning things for the long-term or do you take it step-by-step?

I'm definitely a long-term planner. The foundation for this phase was laid in 2021 when I switched my bowling from side-spin to over-spin. That journey began four years ago, and I believe in the next six to seven months, I'll reach my peak. After that, wherever life takes me, I'm open to it. Once I reach that point, I'll have more time to focus on my batting and other aspects. But right now, my priority is bowling. If I don't bowl well, no matter how fit I am or how much I improve my batting, it won't matter. I need to be the best version of myself as a bowler. That's when I can build on other things.

In 2021, when you changed that action, how challenging was it?

It's all about putting in the volume. I started practising for two to three hours a day, bowling 200-300 balls daily. It was a long journey.

AFTER 2021, I WASN'T CHASING A COMEBACK. I FOCUSED ONLY ON REFINING MY NEW TECHNIQUE TO BECOME A MORE IMPACTFUL BOWLER

Every day, I'd wake up at 5:30 am and head to practice. After 2021, I didn't know if I'd ever get another call for the Indian team. I had no clear direction then. But I kept pushing myself, telling myself that if I could perfect this new technique I was working on, I'd become a more impactful bowler. That was my only goal — not to make a comeback, but to become a better bowler.

And it's working out so far. I'm still excited to see where I stand in the next seven months. I'm waiting for that time.
