A one-way battle for the drivers' championship had become a consistent occurrence over the last few years. Heading into 2025, with all eyes on the impressive McLaren unit, it was almost undeniable that one of its two drivers would be the favourite for the title.

Lando Norris, who has been the team's brightest asset since 2019, started the season with a statement win in the opener. With his rival from the past having a challenging time with Red Bull and the Ferrari duo seeming slightly adrift, the 25-year-old had a near-clear path ahead.

But in the last two rounds in Bahrain and Saudi Arabia, his teammate Oscar Piastri — a young and fairly new driver — has announced his arrival, making it clear that the title is in his sights too.

The Bahrain victory

Piastri made it clear that settling for second would not be his label.

After claiming an authoritative pole position for the Bahrain Grand Prix, the Australian blazed through the Sakhir circuit to become the first double race winner this year.

McLaren certainly moved on from the slightly bitter Japanese race weekend in no time, but now faces a growing and potentially destructive challenge — a fierce battle amongst its driver duo.

Though Norris drew first blood and won the season opener in style, he has been unable to climb the top step of the podium since.

It almost seems like the British driver buckles under high-pressure moments — an ever-present element in the sport.
