

the playoffs aren't dominated by just one or two sides. That balance keeps fans engaged and ensures the tournament's continued success.

RR has always focused on nurturing young talent like Riyan Parag, Dhruv Jurel, and now Vaibhav Suryavanshi. How do you develop youngsters in a high-pressure, results-driven IPL environment?

THE AUCTION SYSTEM IS WHAT KEEPS THE LEAGUE HIGHLY COMPETITIVE. THE ABILITY TO REBUILD EVERY THREE OR FOUR YEARS ENSURES THAT NO TEAM DOMINATES INDEFINITELY. ANY TEAM CAN BEAT ANY OTHER, AND THAT'S WHAT MAKES THE IPL SO EXCITING

Many players spend three years at a franchise without getting enough chances. A new team might offer them better opportunities, which is crucial for their careers. If a player gets stuck in a franchise for six to nine years without regular game time, it could harm their development.

For young Indian players especially, re-entering the auction provides a fresh start. Even a three- or four-year stint at a single franchise can sometimes limit a player's growth if they would have fit better into another team's balance or strategy.

There are arguments on both sides, and finding a perfect solution is difficult. But the results speak for themselves — the league remains competitive, different teams win, and

A large part of that is just the philosophy of the franchise. Since the early years, we have always tried to identify and develop — not necessarily just young talent — but those who are probably not as recognised.

I wouldn't call Pravin Tambe young, right? He was someone who got into the franchise. 'Young' is, of course, just one operative word, but it's about identifying talent that has probably not been seen by many.

We put a lot of time and effort into doing that. And I think a large part of the franchise's mission is not only to develop talent on the cricket field but also beyond it.

Even when you look at our marketing, sales, media, and digital teams, many of them are filled with young talent that has gone on to make a difference. You often bump into people outside cricketing circles who started here and are now part of other leagues or teams, having progressed in their careers.
