

SRH's IPL metamorphosis: Evolution or overcorrection?

SRH's transformation from Warner's bowling-first leadership to Cummins' batting onslaught is bold — but is its high-risk strategy running into the law of averages?

Pranay Rajiv, Anish Pathiyil

pranay.rajiv@thehindu.co.in & anish.p@thehindu.co.in Indian Premier League (IPL) team Sunrisers Hyderabad's 12-year existence can largely be divided into two eras – the first, anchored by David Warner and Kane Williamson, was characterised by bowling efficiency, while the ongoing second, helmed by Pat Cummins, is defined by an aggressive, batting-heavy approach.

Interestingly, Sunrisers have thrived despite these starkly different philosophies, emerging as one of the IPL's most consistent teams. Their evolution is not just the story of a franchise but also a reflection of how the IPL and T20 cricket have evolved.

Warner-Williamson era: A bowling powerhouse

From its inception in 2013,

Sunrisers Hyderabad maintained a reputation as a formidable bowling unit. However, it was under Warner's captaincy, beginning in 2015, that SRH's bowling prowess reached new heights. Between 2015 and the end of the 2021 season, SRH boasted one of the best economy rates in the IPL, second only to the short-lived Rising Pune Supergiant.