

Waiting for the big break: Amanda Anisimova, who reached two major finals last year, is in a good position to win her maiden Slam this year.

capture the French Open again for her third Major title. Otherwise, hot-and-cold Gauff will have more valleys than peaks due to recurring double faults — her staggering total of 431 led the WTA Tour last year — and unforced forehand errors.

- Amanda Anisimova, who reached two Major finals last year, will win her first Grand Slam title at either the Australian Open or the U.S. Open. Her relentless aggression, superb technique, and newfound confidence make her Slam breakthrough virtually inevitable. In a poignant awards ceremony, Anisimova will recall her loving father, who passed away before he could see her fulfil her lifelong dream.

- Victoria Mboko (right) will seize her first Major title. In her rookie season, the smiling 19-year-old Canadian displayed the attributes of a champion — athleticism, power, physique, strategy, and poise — to skyrocket from No. 333 to No. 18. On her stunning 6-1, 6-4 upset over Gauff in Montreal, renowned coach Paul Annacone said, 'What amazed me most is it looked like Mboko felt she didn't have to play outside her game, her comfort zone. Coco was off, but a lot of that was due to Mboko's power and consistency.' The Canadian sensation reminds cognoscenti of Serena Williams, but with sweet, not smack, talk.

- Iga Swiatek surprised everyone, including herself, in 2025 by winning Wimbledon on her least-successful surface after being dethroned at Roland Garros on her best surface. Ominously, though, the intense World No. 2 failed to defeat a top-seven player at any of the four Majors and was overpowered by Sabalenka, Elena Rybakina, Anisimova (twice), Jelena Ostapenko (twice),
