The storm tried to stop us — but our spirit only grew stronger.

As principal of Air Force School, Jamnagar, last year, I had the privilege of hosting our annual Interschool Sports Championship.

We welcomed six sister schools: Jaipur, Pune, Jodhpur, Bhuj, Gandhinagar, and Jaisalmer, along with our own team. There were nearly 400 outstation students on our campus for a week of sport and camaraderie. Every detail had been meticulously arranged and rehearsed. These included separate accommodations for girls and boys, three meals a day and snacks, a medical team for emergencies, scheduling the venue and event logistics. All plans were perfectly in place.

But shortly after the teams' arrival, heavy incessant rains lashed the city. This was due to a depression over the Arabian sea hitting Jamnagar. Flood-like conditions engulfed the city, and for a moment it seemed the championship might have to be called off. Cancelling was simply not an option, as the out-station teams were already settled in and our students had trained for months; we did not want their enthusiasm and hard work to be in vain.

What followed was truly extraordinary. They say students learn by observation and behavior of their mentors and not by long moral lectures given to them in classrooms or corridors. In that case, they learned plenty that week. Teachers, students, and staff braved water-logged roads and harsh conditions to reach the campus, determined not to let the rain dampen their spirit. Together, we completely reimagined the event: classrooms and halls became indoor arenas, schedules were reshuffled overnight, and we ensured that every participant had the chance to compete. Because of the large number of out-of-station students, our entire team worked from dawn to late night all week. Yet none of us felt exhaustion — thanks to the strong, positive, and inspiring team.

Several of our own team members had their homes submerged by the floods. Yet none requested leave. Had they requested it, it would have been granted without hesitation.

The spirit of teamwork, positivity and a never-give-up attitude filled our campus that week.

Every game was rescheduled and played, despite obstacles.

When Air Force School Jamnagar won overall championship, it wasn't a mere trophy. The win was more than just athletics; it was a collective win of camaraderie and resilience—both emotional and physical.
