India vs Pakistan, 2007

« One wicket left. Six needed from four. A slower ball. A desperate scoop. A simple catch at short fine leg. In that suspended heartbeat, India's improbable journey found its perfect ending.

After a group-stage tie settled by a bowl-out, India and Pakistan were drawn back into each other's orbit for the final, and Johannesburg braced itself for another classic. India's innings was shaped by Gautam Gambhir's nerveless 75, an anchor forged in pressure, and lit up by a fearless 20-year-old Rohit Sharma, whose brisk 30 pushed the total to a tense, tantalising 157. Pakistan's reply exploded into life through Imran Nazir's breathtaking 33 off 14, a blitz that threatened to tear the chase open until Robin Uthappa's arrow throw found him short and swung the night again. Wickets fell, hope flickered as Misbah-ul-Haq stood firm, carrying Pakistan to the edge of a miracle. Then came the final over. Joginder Sharma. One wicket left. Six needed from four. A slower ball. A desperate scoop. A simple catch at short fine leg. In that suspended heartbeat, India's improbable journey found its perfect ending.
