"It doesn't get any better than this" was a phrase that tennis broadcasters often used when the legendary Big Three enthralled us with their greatest matches in Grand Slam finals. Then, surprisingly and suddenly, came the new Big Two — Carlos Alcaraz and Jannik Sinner.

Their relentlessly audacious and aggressive attacking games made us rethink how tennis could be played, capturing the last eight Grand Slam titles and showcasing their talent in seven finals during 2024–25.

After several mind-blowing 'Sincaraz' duels — most particularly the iconic 2025 French Open final (above) — the broadcasting encomium du jour morphed into a question: "How can tennis be played any better than this?"

Besides their superior talent, technique, and tactics, "These top players handle pressure better than anyone else," noted former No. 1 Jim Courier. Never before in tennis history was that attribute showcased with such thrilling 'anything you can do, I can do better' clutch shots than during their 4-6, 6-7(4), 6-4, 7-6(3), 7-6(2) duel at Roland Garros. Both protagonists were previously unbeaten in Grand Slam finals, with Alcaraz 4-0 and Sinner 3-0. That it was their first Major final against each other only heightened the excitement.

The 15,000 Court Philippe-Chatrier spectators and a billion TV viewers witnessed a terrific Alcaraz comeback from two sets down. But it took a Houdini-like escape, serving at 3-5, love-40 in the fourth set, to stay alive.

The nerveless Alcaraz fended off three championship points, later saying, "I just believe all the time. I never have doubts about myself, even in those match points down. I thought just one point at a time."
