

Defence vs pace in Texas main event

Sean Strickland's Philly shell meets Anthony 'Fluffy' Hernandez's relentless wrestling in a February 22 headliner built on pressure, pace and control.

The upcoming main event in Texas on February 22 between Sean Strickland and Anthony 'Fluffy' Hernandez presents a classic clash of styles: a defensive striker against a pace-based grappler.

Strickland (right) relies on his signature Philly shell defence, a stance where the lead arm is placed across the torso to protect the body, while the rear hand guards the chin.

His game revolves around keeping the fight standing, where he can outpoint opponents through sheer volume, combined with frustrating defensive parries.

Statistically, Strickland lands 5.95 significant strikes per minute and pairs it with a 60% strike defence. His biggest challenge will be managing the frantic pressure of Hernandez, who averages an impressive 6.46 takedowns per 15 minutes.

Hernandez enters this bout on an eight-fight winning streak, most recently securing a submission win over Roman Dolidze.

Unlike many middleweights who rely on raw power, "Fluffy" wins through cardio-grappling, using pace to exhaust opponents before finding a finish.

While Strickland's takedown defence is a strong 76% on paper, Hernandez is known for his ability to chain wrestling attempts and maintain top control once the fight hits the canvas.
