

Ready to fire: Jasprit Bumrah has made it clear he loves playing for India, and he must have been amused by all these reports from armchair experts about his workload. GETTYIMAGES of the player should be questioned. If, at the highest level of the game, a player, be a batter or a bowler, is not fit to play all five Test matches with the generous week-long breaks between the second and third Test matches and between the fourth and fifth Tests, then he should not be picked for any of the Tests and a young, hungry-to-make-a-mark player be brought in.

For far too long, some players have taken Indian cricket for granted and taken breaks on a whim, with this silly workload reason as an excuse. All they show by that is an unhealthy disregard for Indian cricket and that they are keeping themselves above Indian cricket.

Most of these players are certainties and know that even if they don't play a game or two, their places will be secure, and they can come back immediately if they make themselves available.

Oh, for a selection committee that will get up and tell them, 'Ok, take a break, but then, don't expect to be picked when you feel like it. We will decide if we need you or not'. If only these players remembered that they are what they are because of Indian cricket. Their name, fame, wealth, and even millions of fans are because of Indian cricket. So, some loyalty to Indian cricket and their millions of fans should be considered before taking casual leave from the game.

And workload be damned.

Some loyalty to Indian cricket and their millions of fans should be considered before taking casual leave from the game.