

Peaking at the right time: Satwik-Chirag is one of the most feared doubles pairings in the world right now. A lot will be expected of them at the Paris Olympics. GETTY IMAGES singles and she's almost always going to go up against the best players on the other side of the court. Her personal discomforts against certain players do not matter and Sindhu has seen it long enough to not be bothered either. For someone like Ashmita, this will get a bit harder. If you look at Okuhara, she too hasn't been in great form lately. She has had her fair share of challenges and injuries, but it doesn't matter. She might be a former World Champion, but you have to beat her and get ahead and build from there. A good example to see here is H.S Prannoy. He had defeated many top players. Just that he wasn't able to get those wins consistently enough and in back-to-back matches to put him in a position for a podium finish at the bigger events. Now he's found that consistency and the results are telling. It's a journey and going through the motions of these matches is the only way forward.

Future of Indian women's badminton

Whenever we see young talent