

2002: Rechristened the ICC Champions Trophy, the 2002 final in Colombo was twice disrupted by rain, preventing a conclusive result. Originally scheduled for September 29, the final featured India and Sri Lanka. Batting first, Sri Lanka posted 244/5 in 50 overs, but India managed only two overs before rain forced a halt to play. A reserve day on September 30 saw Sri Lanka bat first again, this time scoring 222/7. However, with India at 38/1 in 8.4 overs, the match was once again abandoned due to rain. As a result, no Man of the Match or Man of the Series awards were given, and both teams were declared joint winners. GETTY IMAGES

2004: England seemed poised for a fairytale ending, but West Indies had other plans. In the final at The Oval, London, opener Marcus Trescothick scored a fine century despite wickets falling regularly at the other end. Although England managed only 217, Darren Gough's five-wicket haul kept the host in the hunt, reducing the Windies to 147/8. However, Courtney Browne and Ian Bradshaw (both in pic) held the fort, guiding the visiting team to its first Champions Trophy title. GETTY IMAGES
