

EARLY BLUNDER OR EARLY STOPPAGE?

The referee's decision to stop the fight sparked a widespread debate, as Anshul was still conscious and had a firm hold on Salkild's ankles.

India's Anshul Jubli had one of the shortest stays inside an Ultimate Fighting Championship (UFC) cage at UFC 312.

Facing debutant Quillan Salkild, Anshul had the advantage in terms of UFC experience. However, Salkild, in front of a home crowd, showed the world that he is here to stay with a stunning 19-second knockout win.

Anshul initiated a left hook and lowered his guard in the process, allowing Salkild to capitalise on the opening.

All it took for the Australian was a single, powerful right hook to stagger Anshul, who collapsed immediately after. The official rushed in at once and ended the contest, making it one of the shortest lightweight bouts in UFC history.

To the layman, the referee's intervention might have seemed precautionary. However, the decision sparked widespread debate, as Anshul was still conscious and had a firm hold on Salkild's ankles.
