Australian spinner Matthew Kuhnemann, the highest wicket-taker in the Test series against Sri Lanka, was reported for a suspect bowling action. Cricket Australia confirmed the development, stating that match officials raised concerns following the second Test in Galle. Kuhnemann must undergo an official assessment to determine whether his bowling action complies with the regulations. If his action is found to be illegal, he will be suspended from bowling in international cricket until he modifies his action and passes a subsequent reassessment, but he can continue playing domestic cricket for Tasmania.
