

THE ROOT OF JOE'S RUNAWAY RENAISSANCE

The England batter's recent exploits have not only elevated him to the realm of all-time greats but have also left his contemporaries in the dust.

The England men's cricket team is scheduled to play 22 Tests over the next 26 months, a figure indicative of how well the longest format is thriving.

However, if you are a fan of a certain 5'5" Mumbai-born retired cricketer, this 22-Test figure might have an ominous ring.

This glut of Tests for the Three Lions provides a perfect launchpad for leading English batter Joe Root to aim for, and potentially claim, at least a few records currently held by Sachin Tendulkar.

Root has been amassing runs at a furious pace in recent years, surpassing several stalwarts in the overall Test runs tally. Since January 1, 2020, he has accumulated 5,527 runs — 2,529 more than the second-best batter, Marnus Labuschagne.

The 33-year-old Root currently has 12,886 runs in the format, placing him fifth among all-time Test run-scorers. Given his relatively injury-free career, it wouldn't be unfathomable to expect him to continue for another five years or maybe even more.

If Root maintains his career average (50.93), he would require just under 60 innings to surpass Tendulkar's Test run tally.

Also under threat from Root's run accumulation is Tendulkar's record

Root currently has 12,886 runs in the format, placing him fifth among all-time Test run-scorers.
