in what we call triple extension — extending the ankles, knees, and glutes simultaneously. Your foot hits the ground, and the ground pushes back with an equal and opposite force. We need athletes to be seriously strong. It's all well and good saying an athlete is genetically amazing, the coaching is incredible, and they are psychologically strong.

But if they're not able to get to the start line due to injury, none of that matters," he says.

According to Gurindervir, the injury challenge has been a significant limitation.

"I think you need a lot of support, especially if you are trying to be a sprinter, and that wasn't really available in India. I started my training in Jalandhar and then at the national camp in Patiala. For a long time, the workouts I followed were the same ones that had been taught by Russian coaches who came to India 20 years ago. I didn't have any facilities or a physio.

I wouldn't even dare to push myself in training because I wasn't sure if my warm-up routine was
