athletes, we see the Kenyans and Ethiopians transitioning earlier in their careers.

In the end, it all comes down to the athlete. If they feel they've achieved everything on the track and don't have much more speed, then there's nothing wrong with starting something new.

I think it depends on the age — not too early, I'd say. Probably after your 20s. Even in your 30s, you can go on. But with everything you do, you've got to understand it and be willing to work hard.

When you shifted to marathons in 2017, how challenging was the transition?

As an athlete, you have to be honest with yourself. Back then, I had done and achieved everything I could on the track. It was important to recognise that.

If you are not motivated, it's important for you to find something that you're still passionate and hungry for. By the time I participated in the World Championships in London in 2017, I had already made up my mind that it was going to be my last track and field race. After that, I would move on to marathons and see if I could be as successful as I was on the track.

Now that I've retired, I can openly talk about it. I thought I could have done more. But again, that's all I was capable of. When I made the transition, I was hungry and willing to work hard and start a new challenge. For an athlete, it's important to maintain that hunger and desire.

When an athlete as successful as you moves into a different territory, how does he handle failures?

As an athlete or even someone in a decent job, when you fail at something — whether it's a race, a job interview or becoming the CEO of a company — you would automatically think that you failed

Before I won the Olympics in London in 2012, I competed in Beijing in 2008 and didn't even make the final. I was devastated and felt like I had let so many people down.
