

Great Rift Valley in Kenya, in the middle of nowhere, with no electricity, no hot water, and then imagine being in London, where you have everything. You've got the streets, there are no electricity cuts, everything is available. But I was willing to accept that challenge in Kenya and adapt. I think as an athlete, sometimes you might not have the best facilities, but you've got to be willing to adapt and get on with it.

After an illustrious journey, what's keeping you busy these days?

I'm getting to spend a lot more time with my family, but I'm also doing things I could never do. When you are an athlete, you're in your lane, you can't get out of your line, but now, it's great to travel and spend time here in Mumbai as an ambassador for the Tata Mumbai Marathon. It's wonderful to share my story and motivate people.

I'm also doing charity work. I'm an ambassador for Save the Children, where I try to do a lot of work in terms of just being able to make a difference for children around the world, because I believe we can all help one another. I'm also an ambassador for Youth Sport Trust.

Your journey has been an inspiration for many. But why aren't more British Asians taking up athletics these days? What are they lacking?

Historic: Mo celebrates his 10,000m win during the 2016 Rio Olympics.

GETTY IMAGES

There are a lot of athletes out there, and I think it's just about creating opportunities and making the most of them, without overcomplicating things.

I think my story — how I arrived in a new country, was trafficked into the UK, and all the challenges I had to face and overcome — should serve as an example for many, because we can overcome a lot of things if we have the will to stick to something, work hard, and keep going. We'll face hurdles along the way, whatever we do, but it's how we overcome them.