

»» CHEQUERED FLAG

RESILIENCE AND REDEMPTION

From Norris's golden home win to Hulkenberg's long-awaited podium, the 2025 British GP delivered pure theatre.

Kavita Menon

kavita.menon@thehindu.co.in

Fate unravels in unexpected ways — there's no way to predict who ends up on the right side of things, and who pays the price.

The 2025 Silverstone Grand Prix typified that truth. On a weekend that began with a mix of expected patterns and unpredictable turns, it ended with redemption for a veteran, heartbreak for some, and a home victory for a rising British star.

McLaren's 1-2 finish extended its season-long dominance, with Lando

Norris once again leading the charge — but there's no denying that seeing the third-place winner, Nico Hulkenberg of Kick Sauber, finally have his day brought a bright smile to many a face. To walk into the paddock season after season, longing for an elusive moment of glory, the German's elation was shared by one and all.

For him, this wasn't just a podium — it was a narrative arc finally coming full circle. After 239 races, 15 seasons, eight constructors, and many near misses, he was finally able to reap the rewards of his toil and hard work, capping an emotional, ecstatic weekend for a driver who no longer bears the painful record for most races in F1 history without a podium.

For homeboy Norris (left), fortune smiled wider. With the eyes of a passionate British crowd — including

Pics: REUTERS