

overseas cricketers have made a living by needling the Indian cricket lovers with their mostly negative comments about Indian cricket and cricketers. To an extent, the Indian media is also responsible, as they go to overseas cricketers and ask them about Indian cricket.

How often, on overseas tours, do we see members of the Indian media chasing former players from the host country — players whom even their own nation has almost forgotten — for an interview? It's almost as if validation about Indian cricket and its cricketers has to be obtained from overseas players.

While it may be unfair to comment on earlier generations, one can say with confidence that the post-Independence generation of Indian cricketers had no inferiority complex and were prepared to stand toe to toe with the opposition when playing overseas. Yes, the results may not have been great, but how many touring teams win abroad even today?

Hopefully, this seeking out of overseas opinion about India will cease sooner rather than later, and we won't feel the need to canvass foreign opinion to boost our confidence.

Today, in the days of public media, where getting views and followers is the theme, one of the fastest ways to increase the numbers is by commenting on matters Indian.
