

WHEN OLD TRAFFORD REMEMBERED ITS LEGENDS — AND MISTOOK ONE TOO!

From mistaken celebrity sightings to real cricketing honours and absent appetites — our correspondent weighs in on the curious scenes at Old Trafford.

Shayan Acharya

shayan.acharya@thehindu.co.in Farokh Engineer was enjoying his drink when the Diary caught up with him at the old pavilion at Old Trafford. It was a busy and emotional day for the former India wicketkeeper-batter as Lancashire honoured him and former West Indies captain Clive Lloyd by unveiling two stands named after them at the venue.

Engineer, who played County cricket for the club for nearly a decade and guided Lancashire to four Gillette Cup titles, became the first Indian player to have a stand named after him in England. Joined by his family and old friend Dilip Vengsarkar, also a former India captain, Engineer looked excited as he happily obliged spectators with selfies and autographs.

"This is not just my achievement, it is India's achievement," the octogenarian told the Diary.

Lloyd, who captained the West Indies to two World Cup wins, and Engineer both joined Lancashire in the 1960s, shortly after English Counties were allowed to sign overseas players. They had memorable stints with the club —

Legacy honoured: Old Trafford unveiled the Sir Clive Lloyd and Farokh Engineer Stand (facing page, left) ahead of the fourth England-India Test. Engineer played 46 Tests for India. SHAYANACHARYA