Chaos does not necessarily have to be a negative thing, some revel in it. The latest example is England manager Sarina Wiegman, who watched her team retain its European Championship crown after a penalty shootout win against world champion Spain.

"This has been the most chaotic tournament; from the first game there was chaos ... turns out we love football chaos!" a jubilant Wiegman said.

Spain and England, respectively, scored a goal apiece, with the teams heading to a shootout after battling it out for 120 minutes.

The Spaniards were wasteful when it mattered, managing just one goal from 24 attempts. Some would blame destiny but the practical approach would be to criticise the players' lack of clinical finishing.

The start of the shootout was dramatic, and the more superstitious among the Spain faithful might have seen it as a sign that their women's team would complete its trophy cabinet.

England's Beth Mead, who went up first, found the net with her initial attempt, but it was not a clean connection — she slipped while striking the ball, resulting in a double touch.

As per the revised IFAB rules on penalties involving double touches, Mead was required to
