In the biggest international event in women's football of 2025, 16 nations will compete for Europe's premier crown in the EUROs, which will be played in Switzerland across eight cities from July 2-27, with the final to be held in Basel.

The competition, first held in 1984, has had 13 editions, but only five nations have lifted the crown. Germany has dominated with eight titles, Norway has two, while Sweden, the Netherlands and defending champion England have lifted the crown once each.

Spotlight on Spain and England

All eyes will be on world champion Spain (above), which will aim for its first-ever European crown. If boasting a star-studded squad wasn't enough, La Roja have two Ballon d'Or winners in their ranks — Alexia Putellas and Aitana Bonmati — who caught the eye in the last edition with more final-third passes (126) than any other player and also ranked first for passes completed in the opposition half (182), ahead of England's Keira Walsh (171).

From the perspective of European dominance in recent times, Spain has solidified that position after beating France
