

Setting the right example: In a time when it's fashionable to question every call, watching two young superstars in the making concede points that could have swung a Grand Slam final was truly heart-warming. REUTERS

the line judges, at Wimbledon, it's going to be AI making the line calls, which means no line judges at all. While some players have expressed reservations, most seem to have welcomed it because a line call can make the difference between winning and losing. It sure will be interesting to see how it goes, and this could well be the future at tennis events — and even in cricket, when it comes to judging no-balls. Technology has certainly helped make some decisions that would have been tough for humans.

That said, if technology is being worked and operated by humans, there's always a slim chance of it being wrong.

For sports lovers, the fortnight promises plenty to look forward to — with Wimbledon underway and two Test matches between India and England. There's cricket in the West Indies with Australia touring, and in Sri Lanka too, where Bangladesh is playing ODIs. So, if the rains are keeping you from work or play, don't fret — there's loads of sport to watch on TV. Enjoy.

Unlike Federer, Nadal, and Djokovic — each vulnerable on a specific surface — Carlos Alcaraz and Jannik Sinner, even this early in their careers, appear equally comfortable across clay, grass, and hard courts, hinting at a more complete all-surface dominance.
