hoped I'd be able to run and play again like the other kids. Eventually, I had to accept that my legs would never be as strong.

In my village, I was bullied constantly. I wore calipers that helped me walk, but that didn't stop people from targeting me. To regain some confidence, I started going to the gym. It became a kind of therapy. By the time I got to Kirori Mal College, I had 17-inch biceps and six-pack abs. Still, I never imagined becoming a sportsperson. I didn't even know para sports existed. I was focused on my studies and preparing for my Chartered Accountancy exams.

Everything changed in 2015 when my calipers broke. Suddenly, my limp was obvious. I felt embarrassed, but one of my seniors, Sachin Yadav, noticed. He asked me about my condition and introduced me to para sports. I resisted at first, but he persisted and took me to the Jawaharlal Nehru Stadium — by coincidence, the Delhi State Para Athletics Championships were on. I was instantly hooked.

Before I could overthink, Sachin bhaiyya helped me fill out a form for the Haryana State Paralympic Championships. I competed in javelin, shot put, and discus, finishing last in all three. Still, I loved
