According to a BBC report, England's domestic white-ball calendar will see major changes in 2026, with the Vitality Blast trimmed and played in a single block ahead of The Hundred. The review, led by counties in consultation with the England and Wales Cricket Board (ECB) and Professional Cricketers' Association (PCA), aims to improve player welfare and competition flow. From next summer, each team will play 12 group matches instead of 14, with quarterfinals and Finals Day staged immediately after to wrap up the tournament in one stretch.

Australia's T20I captain Mitchell Marsh has confirmed he and Travis Head will open the batting through to next year's ICC Men's T20 World Cup. Marsh, who led Australia at the 2024 T20 World Cup, has embraced the role since David Warner's retirement, opening in all five matches against West Indies last month. Australia has trialed Matt Short, Glenn Maxwell and Jake Fraser-McGurk as openers, but Marsh says his partnership with Head will be the starting point going forward.
