

Biting the dust: Igor Severino (R) became the first-ever UFC fighter to be disqualified for biting his opponent, Andre Lima (L). GETTY IMAGES setbacks, Williams showcased his athleticism and determination, ultimately securing his third consecutive win in the UFC.

'Bite of the night'

There was one other event, buried deep inside the preliminary card, that stole the spotlight from the main card.

A Luis Suarez-esque incident happened when Igor Severino took on Andre Lima in a men's flyweight bout.

Halfway through the second round, Severino pinned Lima to a corner of the cage and went on to bite the latter's biceps (pic, below) when he tried to shake off the former's body lock.

Referee Chris Tognoni stopped the fight, and the bizarre incident was reviewed. Severino initially denied biting Lima before visual evidence showed otherwise. Eventually, Severino was disqualified, and the win was awarded to Lima.

Severino became the first-ever UFC fighter to be disqualified for such an offence. The Brazilian's octagon career is all but over, as there are multiple reports suggesting that his contract might get terminated shortly.

To commemorate this absurd episode, Lima went straight to a tattoo studio to get the bite mark inked.

Fight of the night

After failing to win in his first two UFC fights, Jarno Errens of Holland finally won, playing spoilsport in Steven Nguyen's official debut.

Errens had lost to William Gomis in Paris and SeungWoo Choi in Singapore, but his first business trip to Las Vegas paid off, with all three judges handing him victory in a clean sweep of the scorecards.

The Dutch featherweight found his range and rhythm right from the first round, shattering Nguyen's lip and continuing to unload and batter his opponent from then on.

Errens used his variations to perfection, pounding Nguyen's lead leg and flooring him at the conclusion of the second before continuing to dominate the bout.

Up next

Yet another all-women main event is on the cards as the UFC wagon moves to Atlantic City on March 31.

Erin Blanchfield will take on Manon Fiorot in a women's flyweight bout, accompanied by the co-main event, which will see Vicente Luque go up against Joaquin Buckley in the men's welterweight division.

In their relatively short time in the promotion, Blanchfield and Fiorot have established themselves as the next generation of 125-pound contenders, routinely and decisively knocking off top-tier talent as they make their respective cases for a shot at the title.

The main event could potentially decide the next title contender, as Blanchfield is ranked second and Fiorot is third on the women's flyweight rankings.

Severino initially denied biting Lima before visual evidence showed otherwise. To commemorate this absurd episode, Lima went straight to a tattoo studio to get the bite mark inked.