The sixth and final group of this year's Euro has a perfect mix of established powerhouses and emerging contenders. The 2016 champion Portugal is grouped alongside the 1976 title-winner Czechia, Turkey, and Georgia.

In what might be Cristiano Ronaldo's final big-ticket tournament, Roberto Martínez's men will look to give him the perfect sendoff.

The Martínez era has seen a significant shift from Fernando Santos' pragmatic approach. This is a team capable of scoring four or five goals on any given day, as well as defending against an opponent's late pushes in a close game.

The side enjoyed the best qualification stage in Portugal's history, winning all 10 matches. There's a growing sense that this squad is primed for a special run.

Martínez has predominantly stuck to the back-four formula, which has not only allowed attacking fluidity but also provided a compact defence.

As proof of the squad's versatility, Ronaldo may start the game in any of the three attacking positions, which allows Goncalo Ramos to replace him and offer fresh legs later in the second half. Rafael Leão appears to be the most stable of the three, but there is still room for rotation during the competition.

Leão will likely start on the left side of the pitch, moving Ronaldo to the No. 9 role while placing Bernardo Silva on the right. Alternatively, Ronaldo might be on the right side, with Ramos or Joao Felix in the centre.
