

can surely come up for discussion at the ICC Cricket Committee meeting that is likely to happen during the T20 World Cup, either in the USA or the West Indies.

If the law has to be referred to the MCC, then it would be a lot better if some former players who have played in the IPL and other T20 leagues in the world were brought in for their experience. The MCC makes laws, which are then to be followed by every cricket club, state, and country.

Therefore, a committee that is going to have the biggest impact on the laws of the game must have people who have played it at the highest level and should be from different countries and not just primarily from England. I am just giving you a list of the MCC Laws Committee. I am sure they are all perfectly capable people, but apart from the former umpires, Sundaram Ravi from India and Simon

Giving context: If the dead ball law has to be referred to the MCC, then it would be a lot better if there were some former players who have played in the IPL and other T20 leagues in the world to be brought in for their experience. AFP

Taufel, nobody seems to have any international experience. The list is as follows:

Alan Fordham (Chair)
Deborah Burns
Bob Hampshire
Lt. Col David Jukes
Paul McMahon
Clare Polosak
Sundaram Ravi
Surendiran Shanmugam
Simon Taufel

Dear readers, do you think that recently retired former Test players from other countries should be included or not?

To give some of the uncapped Under-19 players crores of rupees is probably pushing their career progress back considerably because suddenly the focus goes missing.